Dear reader,

The Mouton team is delighted to present this new edition of our catalog of publications. Please take this opportunity to explore our carefully curated handbooks, monographs, collections, journals and digital offerings.

In addition to our well-established portfolio in language documentation, which includes various new grammars and grammar sketches, we are proud of our thriving book program covering the latest scholarship on language, culture, and society. In this context, Mouton once more recognized early career scholars by awarding the Joshua A. Fishman Award for outstanding doctoral research in the sociology of language, which has resulted in inspiring monographs over the years.

In recent months, we published five impressive handbooks on communication science and many of today's pressing issues, including health, the environment, and risk and safety.

Finally, we are excited to announce that eight more of our flagship journals have adopted the Subscribe to Open model in 2025 – a testament to our commitment to Open Access.

Happy browsing!

Type Noun Constructions in Slavic, Germanic and Romance Languages

Semantics and Pragmatics on the Move

Series: Trends in Linguistics. Studies and Monographs [TiLSM] 352

November 2024

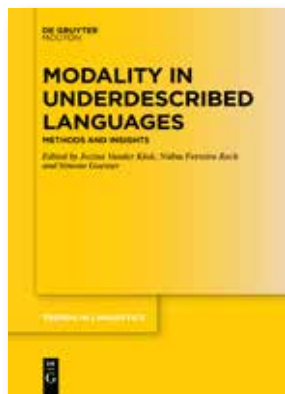

English, XI, 730 pp., 34 fig.

Pb. *RRP € 34.95/ RRP US$ 38.99/ RRP £ 32.00
ISBN 978-3-11-162735-9

This volume addresses constructions with nouns like 'type' and 'sort' in Romance, Germanic and Slavic languages. It offers survey chapters of each language family and contributions focusing on aspects such as grammar, semantics, pragmatics, sociolinguistics, contrastive study and diachronic development. As the first book dedicated to type noun constructions, its varied methodologies elucidate a unique cross-linguistic field.

Discourse Markers in Interaction

From Production to Comprehension

Series: Trends in Linguistics. Studies and Monographs [TiLSM] 376

English, VI, 280 pp., 25 fig.

Pb. *RRP € 19.95/ RRP US$ 21.99/ RRP £ 18.50
ISBN 978-3-11-163179-0

In any kind of human communication, Discourse Markers are part of the game. Yet, as a linguistic class, they remain underdetermined. To gain deeper insight into this complex category, more systematic work is needed on how Discourse Markers are used and interpreted in a variety of situational settings. The aim of this volume is to investigate their role in language production and comprehension from an experimental or corpus-based perspective.

This volume discusses the role of contrast within the conceptual framework of Information Structure. It provides a definition of contrast in relation to the concepts of focus and topic, including experimental evidence. It highlights the importance of distinguishing different types of contrast and analyzing several encoding strategies of contrast, and shows how contrast can be annotated in corpus data using the Question Under Discussion Model.

The multi-factorial model proposed in this work argues that the conceptualization of motion events is influenced by grammatical factors such as viewpoint aspect, on the one hand, and cognitive factors such as ‘endpoint salience’ and ‘capacity load’ associated with increased cognitive cost, on the other. These approaches and findings are further taken as a basis to derive implications for second language acquisition.

The volume aims at giving an overview on the category of ‘converbs’ and related categories from different theoretical and methodological angles. The category is investigated from a diachronic typological to an areal perspective, from the categorization of these structures to the linguistics of contact. The contributors deal with many ancient and modern language families of the Indo-European, but also from Semitic languages.

This volume develops Functional Discourse Grammar’s innovative and unique approach to constituent ordering, both by refining some of its theoretical tenets and by applying it to data from a variety of languages (including Brazilian Portuguese, Dutch, English, Spanish, Italian, Tagalog, Tahitian, Tamil and Turkish). This approach is applied to linearization at all layers of syntactic organization (phrase, clause, and sentence).

As one of the basic clause types, copular clauses have been, and continue to be, a fruitful topic for linguistic research. This book focuses on two of the main subtypes: specificational and predicative clauses. By combining a grammatical with a discursive analysis, the book offers new insights into the structure and function of these clauses based on evidence from usage data (e.g., discourse-embedding, intonation, use of pronominal modifiers).

This book presents a typology of grammatical tone, defined as a tonological operation restricted to the context of a specific morpheme or construction. Tone languages constitute at least half the world's languages, and the great majority of them in Africa and Central America exhibit robust use of grammatical tone. This book details the axes of variation of grammatical tone, and shows why it is crucial for both typology and theory.

The volume examines phonetic nuances with a particular focus on their relation to other linguistic phenomena. Specifically, three interfaces – the phonetic-phonological, the phonetic-morphological, and the phonetic-semantic/pragmatic one – are investigated from a variety of angles and by consistently taking the rapport between phonetics and phonology into consideration to see if and when phonology is needed as a mediator at the interfaces.

The book develops a theory of manner modification with both manner adjectives and manner adverbs in its scope. It proposes an analysis that keeps the semantics uniform across all of its uses, but remains strictly compositional while being grounded in a careful independent examination of its (morpho)syntax. As a result, it offers a holistic and at the same time restrictive theory, which has been largely missing in this domain so far.

From 1999-2004, David Embick and the late Morris Halle developed a compelling analysis of the Latin conjugation using the framework of Distributed Morphology. Though not finished during Halle's lifetime, it remains remarkably relevant to ongoing research. Aspects of the Latin Conjugation makes this work available for the first time, and includes introductions by Embick and Alec Marantz putting the volume in its historical and theoretical context.

This book explores the present and past forms in the Friulian dialect spoken in Tualis. Investigating thirteen inflection classes in the Friulian verb system, the goal of the book is to combine a detailed empirical description with a theoretical account in terms of Nanosyntax, exploring two recent innovations in the nanosyntactic paradigm, i.e. the sub-extracting Spellout Algorithm and lexical entries with Complex Left Branches.

This study investigates the properties of nonfinite domains in several unrelated languages, in order to enlarge the range of phenomena relevant to a principled-based approach to nonfiniteness. It puts the emphasis on clause types distinct from infinitives (gerund clauses, Celtic verbo-nominal ones, Latin passive participle constructions, Portuguese inflected infinitives) and takes advantage of the most recent developments in syntactic theory.

This volume presents cutting-edge research on how sentences are integrated into discourse. The challenge is to find an answer on how bottom-up mechanisms from the core components of grammar and top-down mechanisms from discourse such as Question Under Discussion interact in this process. Perspectives from syntax, semantics and information structure to investigate the computational mechanisms driving the integration process are combined.

This book offers a new angle on long-standing and unresolved questions about the categorial status of English V-ing forms such as participles and gerunds. Beyond its compelling analysis of -ing forms, this book contributes to our knowledge of syntax and morphology, calling into question a number of widely-held assumptions on the distinction between derivation and inflection, and the role of semantics in syntactic and morphological analysis.

This book provides the first in-depth analysis of compounds consisting of more than two lexemes. Focusing on tripartite noun-compounds (e.g. day-care center, football game, hotel bedroom), it highlights the formal and functional characteristics of multi-word compounds. It reveals which two-word compounds are used to form multi-word compounds and explains the cognitive processes involved in the storage and formation of tripartite compounds.

Adverbs seem to raise unsolvable issues for theories of word-classes, both cross-linguistically and language-internally. The contributions in this volume all address this categorial problem from a variety of formal and functional points of view. The papers in the first part deal with the definition of adverbs as a class. The second part focuses on the scope of adverbs, which appears the most promising track leading to a new functional definition.

This book challenges current typologically-oriented definitions of applicative morphology by fleshing out recurrent non-syntactic functions as well as “aberrant” morpho-syntactic behavior attested in a sample of geographically distant and genetically unrelated languages. Besides broadening our understanding of applicatives, it uncovers new sources (spatial-related morphology) and delves into the diachrony of its (non-) syntactic functions.

In natural languages, counterfactuals differ from indicative conditionals for the presence of special occurrences of grammatical tense, aspect, and mood. Using data from languages, such as English, German, Norwegian, French, Italian, Spanish, Latin, Greek, Russian, Ukrainian, Hindi and Khanty, the contributions explore topics such as past and imperfective morphology, X-marking, evidential marking, and embedding in counterfactuals.

The concept of 'negative concord' refers to the seemingly multiple exponence of semantically single negation as in You ain't seen nothing yet. This book takes stock of what has been achieved since the notion was introduced in 1922 by Otto Jespersen and sets the agenda for future research, with an eye towards increased cross-fertilization between theoretical perspectives and methodological tools.

This monograph considers some cases of variation in the expression of clause subordination in the corpus of Old Irish contemporary texts. The variation affects the use of two neuter light heads introducing relative clauses, two temporal conjunctions 'when', and three final markers 'so that'. On the basis of a corpus research, these cases of variation are considered from the philological, descriptive, diachronic and typological perspectives.

In this volume, Rong Chen proposes a motivation model of pragmatics, a coherent framework to account for language use. At a time when theories that seek deeper explanations are frowned upon, Chen's book breaks new ground by arguing and demonstrating that a unified theory of pragmatics is both needed and possible. It should prove a worthy read for students of language use, culture, society, psychology, communication, and language philosophy.

Within intercultural communication research, current debates are branching primarily into cross-cultural and critical directions. In the meanwhile, cultural linguistics and intercultural pragmatics have made notable strides in shaping a dynamic and socio-cognitive framework for understanding intercultural dynamics. This book proposes an empirical grounding of this framework through a meticulous multimodal analysis of intercultural space.

This volume explores the dynamics of metadiscourse and culture in communication. It explores language as a key element facilitating information exchange and interpretation based on prior knowledge and conventions. A discourse-pragmatics approach uncovers the use of interlanguage as an ad hoc output that holds significance for interactants. The book provides valuable insights into the significance of culture in the pragmatics of metadiscourse.

This book discusses what comedians do with jokes while entertaining their audiences. The work takes humorous narratives as entextualised features of audiences' shared experiences, which comedians use for performing situated actions in socio-cultural spaces. Using Nigerian stand-up comedy as a case study, the book systematically pinpoints humorous meaning and acts while explicating the nuances that make such humour possible.

This book is a collection of research papers that focus on the development and use of different African varieties of English from a pragmatic perspective. The authors have attempted to identify the unique communicative features of varieties of English and their relationship to one another. The chapters in the book also explore the interplay of the socio-political factors with the linguistic and interactional factors.

The book focuses on language in Ireland and describes how social factors interact with pragmatic variation, thereby adding to our understanding of how language use varies across social dimensions and providing insights into how social identities impact language use. This volume combines those areas of research on Irish English and (Ulster) Scots that have been most fruitful, but that have not been systematically linked and have remained separate.

Unlike space or time, manner has never been the subject of in-depth investigation. It seems to be an ontological category detectable by the question "how" but where does the notion of manner originate? How is it encoded linguistically, especially in adverbless languages? Given that the question "how" can also cover such heterogeneous notions as degree, instrument, etc., is manner an elusive concept or can it be precisely defined?

This book presents a state-of-the-art cross-linguistic survey of applicative constructions in the functional-typological tradition. The contributions cover, in all major language families and some isolates, the morphosyntactic, semantic and pragmatic variation of applicatives, whether canonical (valency-increasing, syntactically and semantically predictable and optional) or not (valency-neutral, rather unpredictable and/or obligatory).

Natural languages sharply diverge in their behavior with respect to non-verbal predication. This book offers a wide typological overview of how languages deal with non-verbal predication and up to date no other work has attempted to provide a comprehensive overview of this pervasive syntactic phenomenon. The contributions are written by well-known specialists, targeting different languages, thus offering a rich array of typological data.

The cognitive concept of prominence is a key in understanding the organization of grammar. This volume explores the encoding of prominence in Austronesian languages with different typological profiles. The case studies demonstrate the range of ways in which prominence is relevant to different levels of grammatical structure. The adoption of shared frameworks highlights cross-linguistic patterns in the role prominence plays in human language.

Kriol, or (Bissau-) Guinean, a Portuguese creole, is the majority language and the lingua franca in Guinea-Bissau. Also spoken in the diaspora, it is genetically related to the Upper Guinea creoles (Cabo Verdean, Casamancese, and – supposedly – Papiamentu). This book, provided with glossed texts, is a comprehensive description of Kriol grammar and offers a historical perspective on its emergence and an overview of its intralinguistic variation.

The book provides the first comprehensive synchronic description (in English) of Maltese prepositions and their phonological, morphological, syntactic, and semantic properties. The size of the prepositional inventory is determined. The data are drawn from an electronic corpus and conventionally published Maltese literature. Qualitative as well as quantitative methodologies are applied. Topics for follow-up studies are identified.

Europe is a phonologically rich macro-area. The focus is on infrequently attested phonemes. Their occurrences are determined for 210 languages. The results are compared to two cross-linguistic surveys of segmental phonemes. The phenomena are studied quantitatively and qualitatively. The distribution is revealed on maps. The properties of rarities are systematically scrutinized. The areal patterns are integrated into the results of EURO-TYP.

Anger is a basic emotion rooted in largely universal bodily experience, yet its conceptualization is by no means universal, languages can differ in how it is metaphorically understood. Drawing on a wide selection of comparable linguistic data from dozens of languages (including a number of less-researched languages), this volume provides the most comprehensive account of what is universal and what is variable in the folk model of anger and why.

This monograph examines the distributional patterns of five adjectival near-synonyms from the domain of SMELL in American English, focusing on their diachronic development, a dimension that has been relatively disregarded. Their distribution is analyzed across a wide range of contexts which function as a proxy for semantic similarity. The synonym set is undergoing processes of convergence and substitution resulting from extralinguistic factors.

Scholars have been asserting that there are no dialects in Modern Hebrew, which makes Israel an interesting case for variationist linguistic theorising. This pioneering book investigates categories Hebrew speakers use for their classification of linguistic variation. Relying on interviews and experimental data, the categories are analyzed from both qualitative and quantitative perspectives.

This book is a fascinating contribution to cognitive-linguistic research on metonymy analyzing authentic texts. Its five studies expand current metonymy theory by providing evidence that metonymies regularly occur at more than one analytical level of the same utterance and chain to each other in discourse following certain patterns. Several new analytical notions are developed or refined (inferential chain, (in)active metonymy, cascading, etc.).

It offers a theoretically informed empirical analysis of variation that spans across time and space, based on data collected across individuals (cognition), dialect and register (society). How can we productively combine corpora and language experiments in language research and what does the combination of methods mean for cognitive linguistic theory?

This book is the first syntactic analysis of Chinese modals within the Diachronic Syntax framework, based on cross-linguistic syntactic research on grammaticalization. It provides detailed analyses of the constraints on the grammaticalization of modals from lexical verbs into deontic, future, and/or epistemic markers respectively, supporting general theories on syntactic processes involved in the grammaticalization of modal systems universally.

This book is the first full evaluation of the Proto-Australian hypothesis, a longstanding proposal that most Australian languages have a common ancestor: Proto-Australian [PA]. The authors show that nearly all Australian languages descend from PA and have therefore spread from a small homeland. This raises significant questions for analyses of Australian prehistory, archaeology and for theories of hunter-gatherer prehistory and language spread.

The two East Baltic languages Lithuanian and Latvian feature a secondary mood of potentiality, known as the subjunctive that ultimately goes back to the supine, an infinitival form. This book seeks to explain why, when and how the supine developed into the subjunctive. In doing so, it provides the first exhaustive account of the evolution of the subjunctive paradigm and all attested subjunctive forms in the East Baltic dialects.

The volume contains the most important theoretical and methodological papers of Gabriel Altmann (1929-2019). He is the founder of a specific school of quantitative linguistics, focused on mutual interrelations of linguistic characteristics. His approach concentrates on the building of a general theory. This theory is based on the relevance of linguistic laws (Zipf's, Menzerath's and Piotrowski) and concepts of language as a self-regulated system.

The study of language contact in the „new“ English varieties is frequently influenced by sociolinguistic approaches and reference to substrate languages but much less often to functionally-based contact linguistic theory. In this book, Ziegeler applies grammaticalization theory to explain many under-researched features of Singapore English, highlighting the role of the co-existing lexifier in the unique contact setting of Singapore.

This book offers a new narrative about the lexicon of Middle English and the impact of word borrowing in the later medieval period. Loanwords have been seen as being in competition with native terms. Analysis of a large dataset of vocabulary items within a conceptual classification indicates rather that this was a period of augmentation of the lexicon arising from the multilingual context of medieval Britain.

This book explores the evolution of modal constructions of necessity and obligation (i.e. must, have to, (have) got to, gotta, need to, and better) in contact varieties of English. Focusing on Singapore English, Basile examines how contact grammaticalization and substrate influence shape this variety. He introduces a “pan-stratist” model, emphasising the crucial roles played by both the substrate and the lexifier in the restructuring of modality.

This in-depth account of the acquisition of Emirati Arabic offers an insight into the underlying properties of grammar and the cognitive learning mechanisms that children bring to the task. Structurally different from European languages and acquired in a unique multilingual context, Emirati Arabic provides new evidence regarding long-standing questions in the field of language acquisition.

In the field of L2 pronunciation, new approaches to perceptual/production training and instruction have been proposed and new goals have been set. This book brings together these different approaches to L2 pronunciation research in the classroom or in the language laboratory. It summarizes the current research questions on L2 pronunciation teaching and training, and predicts future scenarios for both researchers and practitioners.

This book discusses the role of individual differences in young second language learners. The studies presented here investigate internal individual differences (e.g., language aptitude, motivation, and attitude), external individual differences (e.g., exposure and type of instruction), the interplay between these two types of individual differences, and lastly, the relative contribution of internal and external factors to language learning.

Anybody teaching English to Indonesian speakers should know the difficulties of non-verbal predicates and the placement of be. This book offers new insights into this matter from a grammar competition perspective. Based on a detailed contrast of non-verbal predicates in English and Indonesian, it analyses be-omission patterns of Indonesian learners of English. The focus is on the influence of adverbs and the category of non-verbal predicate.

Model texts are exemplary native-language texts that serve as guides for shaping language abilities. This book explores the profound impact of sustained exposure to model texts on the cultivation of children's writing skills. The findings underscore the transformative influence of integrating model texts into English as a foreign language classrooms. As such, it is a perfect read for educators looking for practical tips on language development.

The current companion will offer a survey of the Afroasiatic, Dravidian, Indo-Aryan, and Turkic languages in contact with Iranian languages. Comparatively few of Iran's minority languages are well-documented or even widely known outside of a small cadre of specialists. A volume that organizes sketches of the non-Iranian languages of Iran offers a unique perspective on the history and structure of the Iranian language.

The book takes a fresh look at typological shifts in English since 1150, focusing on the lexicon. It presents the first empirical study of the means used to extend the nominal word-stock, correlating the central word formation processes as well as borrowing in each century. Additionally, the structural makeup of the nouns in usage is analyzed and related to recent research findings, showing astonishing parallels between grammar and lexicon.

This book proposes a new approach to studying the evolution of emotional expressions in their historical and social contexts, focusing on Old English positive emotions. It blends cognitive linguistic and historical sociolinguistic research to fill the gap in the literature on emotions like happiness, love, and pride. By analyzing historical lexical data, the book reveals how these expressions reflect sociolinguistic variables and societal change.

This book is a descriptive grammar of Warrwa, a moribund Nyulnyulan (non-Pama-Nyungan) language of the Kimberley region of north-western Australia. Based on the author's fieldwork (1985–2002) with the last two speakers of the language, it covers the phonetics and phonology, morphology and syntax of Warrwa; a wordlist and extensive text collection are also included. The syntactic description is usage-based and functionally oriented.

The book constitutes the first systematic analysis of meta-discourse in the spoken domain, by focussing on comment clauses (e.g. 'I think') in Present-day Italian. Based on a semantic and structural analysis, this study shows that speakers switch from discourse to meta-discourse to make their subjective and textual stance explicit and to refer to the relation with the hearer. Comment clauses tend to conventionalize along specific paths of change.

The book analyses Jespersen's cycle in Veneto dialects from different angles: meaning, phonetic properties, and the role of focal features. Its innovation lies in using acoustic data to study the diachrony of negation and revealing how prosody indicates (in)stability during reanalysis. The book shows the importance of phonetic variation in syntactic change.

This book presents synchronic and diachronic studies on verbal periphrases in a range of Romance languages to clarify the boundaries of the category, the features and development of specific constructions, as well as the interrelations between them. The individual chapters adopt diverse analytic perspectives and theoretical and methodological frameworks, and integrate results applying qualitative, quantitative, and psycholinguistic methods.

Expressing Surprise at the Crossroads has as its aim to evaluate the impact of mirativity in Romance languages or – expressed differently – to determine how these languages apprehend surprise and related notions as linguistic devices. The different contributions included in the book point to revealing conclusions concerning the status of surprise in Romance as well as the place that mirativity occupies (if any) in the grammar of these languages.

This work is a descriptive reference grammar of Hmong, as spoken in the diaspora in North Queensland, Australia. Hmong is typologically significant given its long history of language contact and migration, first across Southeast Asia, then in the Anglophone diaspora. By far the most comprehensive work on Hmong to date, the grammar is of interest to specialists in Southeast Asian languages and to typologists.

A remarkable feature of Dyirbal (spoken in north-east Queensland) is that it has an avoidance style, called Jalnguy, which is used in the presence of a tabooed relative, such as the mother-in-law. Every noun, verb and adjective in the everyday style has a different form in Jalnguy (grammar remains the same), and Jalnguy also has fewer words. Studying the correlations between the two styles reveals the underlying semantic system of the language.

Linguistic features that buck sexual and gendered norms are sites of intense politicization in the context of masculinist, heteronormative and transphobic backlash worldwide. Written in the tradition of liberatory queer, trans, and feminist linguistics, this volume presents groundbreaking studies of the phonological, morphological, semantic, pragmatic and discursive forms of non-normativity, showing how domination is resisted as new norms emerge.

Reflexive language is unique to human languages; yet little is known of its use in actual dialogue. Fundamental features of language are manifest in dialogic speech and in lingua francas. Reflexivity, or metadiscourse, is central to successful communication. It is also vital in understanding academic argumentation, essential to academic self-understanding, and at the same time it has wide applications.

This book explores the possibilities of designing, implementing, and evaluating an English language teaching programme based on research in English as a Lingua Franca (ELF). Drawing on the editors and authors' experiences in applying ELF research to pedagogy within a university setting, the book challenges epistemological and institutional structures that position discrete constructs of the English language as central in pedagogical practice.

This volume provides an introduction to applied linguistics for language professions. It promotes academically rigorous thought and action in everyday professional life, a reality which is being increasingly shaped by artificial intelligence. Reading, learning, and practicing with this book and its online offering will reveal where people are superior to artificial linguistic intelligence and what this means for a career in a language profession.

While maritime law and law of the sea are highly-researched domains of law, there are few studies about the language associated with these fields. This volume, which unites legal scholars and linguists, includes chapters that focus on macro levels of linguistic analyses (e.g., discourse and genre analysis) and micro levels (e.g., terminology) as well as translation.

This book analyzes the complex interplay between gesture, speech and other modal resources (e.g., gaze, facial expression, motion) during the presentation of evidence and interpretation of testimony in court. By analyzing recordings of a well-known rape trial, the authors reveal how multimodal oratory contributes to forensic linguistics and gesture studies, and how it helps understand recent policy recommendations for reforming the rape trial.

To understand the evolution of language in the context of deep human history, interdisciplinary work between linguists and scientists from other disciplines (e.g., psychology, archaeology, biology, anthropology, or chemistry) is needed. The book aims to calibrate work on human evolution to trace out a scientific story of language that has plausibility while remaining open to change through new linguistic and non-linguistic discoveries.

As neurodiversity awareness grows across multiple scientific disciplines, attention to neurodivergence has remained largely absent in relevant domains of linguistic research. Using a neurodivergent lens to examine abstract language, particularly when this language appears in potentially divisive discourse surrounding identity, can contribute to a more nuanced understanding of important cultural and social variations in language and cognition.

Past studies of family language socialization often focus on children's verbal communication skills and are conducted from the parents' perspective. This book describes a child's mostly self-directed and near-simultaneous multilingual and multiliterate development from birth to age 8. The present findings thus emphasize the critical role of child agency, and they may redefine and expand on the traditional theoretical framework of language policy.

Once banned even in private, the Kurdish language has been a focal point of conflict between the Turkish state and the Kurdish population. This ethnography examines both Turkey's system of colonial language governmentality and the Kurdish language activism. Adopting a "beyond language" approach, the activism aims to improve the linguistic and socio-political conditions of the Kurds, thus advancing our grasp of language oppression and activism.

Language standardization is problematic because it imposes a dominant group's linguistic variety as the only correct one and promotes unit thinking, i.e., the view of language as a bounded, internally homogeneous unit. This book examines intentional counter-standardization practices to subvert such processes in language education and other contexts, such as discourses on pronunciation or language reclamation for indigenous populations.

This monograph investigates questions around new speakers of Breton, their identities, attitudes, and motivations, and how these intersect with linguistic practices. Using both quantitative and qualitative methods, it probes stereotypes about new speakers, showing that they are not necessarily users of a uniform standardised variety. In fact they manipulate language in ways that allow them to communicate across a wider, more diverse community.

Public attitudes towards the use of gender-inclusive language are being voiced in European languages and beyond. Yet, sociolinguistic research on public attitudes towards the use of gender-inclusive language is mostly missing, and a more thorough understanding and conceptualisation of attitudes is thus needed. Also, a multilingual, comparative perspective is still missing. This edited volume will address these shortcomings.

Sixteenth-century Italy saw the promotion of a literary variety based on archaic Florentine. Bringing together the examination of meta-linguistic sources and the analysis of a corpus of everyday letters, this book explores the reception of this variety across different social groups and across contexts that went beyond the literary sphere. In doing so, it critically examines the ubiquitous, yet somewhat controversial notion of linguistic prestige.

This book investigates, for the first time, the multilingual resources contemporary Jewish speakers in Berlin use when speaking German. The focus of this explorative study is on lexical variation and its social meaning from the speakers' perspective. Through an innovative method, it is shown how shared language ideologies towards Hebrew and Yiddish, but also the individual positioning, shape speakers' perception of linguistic choices.

Higher education institutions (HEIs) have been increasingly affected by processes such as globalization and internationalization, with impacts on language use, teaching and learning in HEIs and their academic communities. The book aims at discussing aspects for the design of language policies, which could support internationalization processes and promote the use of multiple languages and participation of different stakeholders in such processes.

This volume explores the complementarity of two innovative assessment approaches: dynamic and diagnostic language assessment. Each chapter is authored by a leading expert in at least one approach and includes a report of original research and the author's reflection on interfaces between the two approaches and how both might be further developed. The volume is an excellent resource for researchers and practitioners in language assessment.

In human communication, the focus of attention is not always on the information transmitted but on the exchange of affectivity (including emotions). The book reviews the diverse affective factors that intervene in language teaching (particularly of foreign languages) and that surround language learners. Moreover, the book presents a series of studies that analyse the prosody of speech as the most obvious physical manifestation of affectivity.

Roman Jakobson stands alone in his semiotic theory of poetic analysis which combines semiotics, linguistics and Structuralist poetics. These essays propose methods of developing Jakobson's theories of communication and poetic function and provide an increased range of examples of Formalist praxis. Formalist adherence to analysis through the text in itself, reveals (sometimes surprising) structural and semiotic patterns within poems as a whole.

Existential semiotics is a new scientific paradigm which combines the classical semiotics to the continental philosophy. It does not mean a return to existentialism, albeit philosophers from Hegel and Kierkegaard to Heidegger, Jaspers and Sartre are its sources of inspiration. It launches completely new sign categories and concepts to the field. After all, whole semiotics: communication signification, can be seen as a transcendental art.

The authors of this book have worked for many years within the Greimasian and post-Greimasian tradition. The book presents a unified theoretical semiotic framework for the analysis of cultural pictorial texts. It thus brings together four disparate domains: the study of static images (such as painting, sculpture, and photography), the study of dynamic images (such as cinema), animation studies, and the study of interactive digital games.

This book investigates the manner in which satirists play with language when creating satirical texts. Drawing from an interdisciplinary alliance of theories and methods, satirical texts produced by both professional and amateur satirists are analysed for language play using a variety of text-analytic techniques. Results from these analyses are of interest to any reader eager to gain a serious understanding into the playful side of satire.

This book examines intersections between humor, identity, and belonging as manifest in Japanese language interactions between Americans and Japanese, with a focus on gaijin 'foreigner' identities. Through an analysis of recorded interactions and an ethnographic perspective, the study builds a complex understanding of humor in intercultural interaction showing that while "being an outsider" is marginalizing, it is also a means of gaining power.

A recent turn in applied linguistics calls for a more transdisciplinary framework for second language acquisition that embeds sociocultural, sociomaterial, ideological, and emotional dimensions at all levels of analysis. Using this framework, the empirical studies in this volume apply Bakhtin's constructs of language play and heteroglossia to the study of multilingual speech in a range of social situations and second language teaching contexts.

Uncover the impact of the coloniality of language on digital humour. This book addresses the coloniality of language in digital humour from an interdisciplinary decolonial linguistics approach that places attentional processes at the centre of the analysis. Its chapters contribute to linguistic research with a novel theoretical framework for the analysis of digital humour by foregrounding attentional processes and power relations.
